Overview

This project explores the everyday ecosystem of a municipal market, focusing on the interactions between vendors, visitors, and workers. Through extensive UX research methods, the study examines how these stakeholders cooperate, conflict, and adapt within a shared space, and how these dynamics influence their openness to change. The final outcome is a multisensory zine that captures the lived experiences of the market, presenting its stories, tensions, and rhythms in an engaging and accessible format.

Concept

The project translates research insights into a multisensory storytelling format, moving beyond traditional reports. The zine uses narrative, visuals, and interactive elements to represent the emotional and social layers of the market. By focusing on lived experiences rather than just data, the concept allows readers to understand the system intuitively, highlighting both visible interactions and underlying tensions.

Research Question

What drives cooperation and conflict among stakeholders in Municipal Market, and how does it shape their openness or resistance to change?
